NYIPLA The Report: Winter Issue 2017-2018

The Supreme Court has continued to demonstrate considerable interest in intellectual property issues, as it has over the past several years, by granting writs of certiorari in two patent cases so far for review this term (as of publication). While less in number than previous years (at least so far) the two cases promise to have far reaching effects on not only patent law but the role of an Administrative State in the United States.
