Law360, New York (April 16, 2016, 12:36 AM ET) -- A patent-holding company urged the Supreme Court on Thursday to review the invalidation of software company Versata's pricing patent in the America Invents Act's business method patent review program, arguing in an amicus brief that the justices must clarify the program's scope and make clear whether software is patent-eligible.

"We hope the U.S. Supreme Court will take advantage of one of the opportunities being presented to correct the course on patent-eligibility," Charles Macedo, lead attorney for Broadband, told Law360. "It is important to re-establish the U.S. as the home of intellectual property and innovation."
